Kevin,

Great talking to you the other day. Thanks for reaching out. If you are presenting these ideas as your own ideas, I see no need to influence what you've documented. I can't say that I understand everything on the page, but it looks conceptually similar. I think that what's important is explaining the rationale for a board, and why that could be more effective than alternatives. Because I have a feeling there will be a vocal set opposed to anything that looks "corporate" (even though boards are successful tools applied all over... schools, non-profits, etc).

I'm still a long way from wanting to communicate my vision, and many steps remain on the legal front before we could start moving in that direction. Evan also has ideas he wants incorporated in the final setup, including the methods these entities are established (though decentralized authorization). Dash is his baby, so I definitely respect the direction he'd like things to take.

In summary, I have no issues with you posting your ideas and how the information flows could work. But thank you for checking with me.
